Graduate Research Assistants with External Living Support

I. Summary

Situations arise wherein a student in a research-based graduate program is receiving support for living costs, but not tuition, from a non-university source such as a foundation or government agency. When tuition support is provided through a sponsored research project, the preponderance of the student's effort should contribute to the student's intellectual development and progress toward graduation, while the student may also make additional specific contributions to the progress of the sponsored program. In this situation, the university must provide market rate compensation for the research assistant's work on the research project. The following are required:

1. The student will receive research assistant compensation of at least $1000 per semester. This must be detailed in the offer letter.

2. The faculty mentor must provide certification of the student's contributions to the sponsored project.
